Subsequently, a new city was built on top of the existing one, effectively doubling the urban network, covering its rivers to become streets, building Catholic churches above Aztec temples, and converting the ceremonial center into the seat of colonial power. Adapting an existing context and inventing a new one seems to be in the ether of the city.

So it stands to reason that Inventing Reality —a new anthology that highlights the work of twenty-seven photographers from the New Orleans area—should be no ordinary book. The new publication, which is released by LUNA Press to coincide with the PhotonOLA festival of photography taking place this month, tells an arresting story about the identity of a city as immortalized by its photographers.
